FRIDAY MORNING, JANUARY 27, 1860.

THE MORALE OF THE BALMORAL. The subject of the dress of woman, is agitated again with a warmth which few other topics evoks. The sudden simultaneous display in the streets of bright Balmoralsthe happiest hit of the royal and sensible Victoria; has precluded the possibility of talking of anything else but the skirt and its corollaries on the promenade; while the social circle is ruffled by a rough struggle between stand by, the weather. It is a suggestive sufficient to accommodate the trade. fact, also, that the burden of the argument rests not with the ladies. Men pursue the strain with an excitement which they never experience in regard to their own apparel. Revolutions in the outward man are never known. The lords of creation are the meekest minions of Fashion. While they criticise sharply every new movement in the toilette of the opposite sex, and argue, from their profoundest intellectual depths, for hours together, the crinoline and kindred an increase or a decrease of bonnet, yet they are contented to remain patiently indifferent to their own grievances and pressing needs. How long have gentlemen endured the hat without a murmur? The cunning instrument of torture-binding the brows as with a chaplet of iron, and crushing out all free and healthful thought -- concentrating the heats of the head, and bringing them to a withering focus upon the crown, where they wilt the fair and comely hair, leaving barren spots by which to trace their desolating progress—towering aloft in grim and grace-less proportions, embarrassing every natural movement of the nead, and always in imminent peril of striking something and going to which is ample security for twice the amount. unprofitable wreck—the irrepressible object. the thing continually in the way, the crowning disgrace of civilization, the marvel of the savage, and the terror of wild animals-defiance of the tyrant, the Paris fashion print, is on his record? The Balmoral is one step ahead in the emancipation of women from the thraldom of mitive picturesque. Balmoral, the young lady will roam o'er the mountain's brow, and do the genteel bounding zephyr over fence and field, inhaling with every step a fresh stock of strength and generous spirit. To roam over the hills and far away, will be the ambition of the Mc-Flimsey. At the eternal shrine of Nature she will whisper vows that entail no sorrow. Flirtation with the mountain airs will be all her desire, and she will fearlessly gather

Need we relate the saving grace that is in the Balmoral of the city? Has not the eye of the male reader dilated with satisfaction and pride at the sight of its pretty folds serenely soaring above the realm of mud? No longer are our brightest and best, at the mercy of neglected pavements. No longer shall humorous housemaids appal them on Saturday morning, with threatenings of rushing torrents of Schuvlkill. No more shall their entailed accumilations of straw, etc., provoke the rude laughter of pedestrians.

There is but one more step to take, and even now rumors reach us, yet lacking shape, that the Empress Eugenic has taken it. When the glory of the Balmoral is untarnished by a single outside vestment; when to see a lady's ankles will no longer be an event; then an era of rational civilization will have dawned, then will we no longer despair of a reformation in the matter of manly hat. Thus far, even, Balmoral teaches the men a lesson of independence and sense, which we trust will not be unheeded .- Phil. Bulletin.
